Excerpt from Down at Uncle Hiram s: A Musical Drama in Three Acts The scene of our sketch is laid in one of the rural districts of New England. Hiram Weller is a well-to-do farmer with a kind, motherly sort of a wife, a beautiful daughter and a bright son who is fast approaching manhood. They occupy a typical New England farm-house which has long been a kind of gathering place for the relatives and neighbors; and to miss a social event at Uncle Hiram s, was counted a loss indeed. Our sketch opens with such a gathering on a pleasant Sunday afternoon in early autumn. While the women are inside, engaged in social chat, or assisting in spreading the bounteous dinner-table, the men have strolled out under the appletrees, smoking, whittling and talking, - occasionally cracking a timely joke - till Walton Cameron, a young collegian and neighbor s son who manifests a decided preference for Uncle Hiram s daughter, comes on the scene, when the men turn to banter him on the technical terms of his scientific training, and finally insist on a song, which after a little parleying he good-naturedly renders in such excellent form that their banter turns to praise.
