Excerpt from The Morphology of the Podocarpineae: A Dissertation Thompson (20) lays a good deal of stress on the megasporangium membrane as a primitive character. It is entirely eliminated in Taxineae, but characterizes all the members of the other family except Podocarpus itself. As the ovulate structures of the type genus are by far the most specialized of the family, this is not surprising. Miss Robertson thought the megasporangium membrane and spongy tissue were in some way correlated with the presence of winged pollen, but their occurrence in Saxeothaea with its wingless microspores breaks down this supposition.
